Jay-Z

An empire in and of himself, Jay-Z continues to prove that he is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, living rappers. It's clear that he not only views success in financial terms but in artistic terms as well. He's the epitome of a "rags to riches" story and has faced many hurdles in his rise to fame. Born Shawn Carter, he was the youngest of four children raised by a single mother and grew up in Brooklyn's Marcy Housing Projects. He attended Eli Whitney High School where he was classmates with legend Notorious B-I-G. While he was hustling the streets, he met rapper Jonathan Burks, who went by Jaz-0 and became a mentor for Jay-Z. After releasing his third album The Black Album, he announced he was retiring from rap due to lack of competition. During this break, he became the president of Def Jam Recordings and signed a slew of popular acts. He later resigned, complaining about the company's resistance to change, and took on many other projects, including becoming part-owner of the New Jersey Nets. Beginning in 2006, Jay-Z made his comeback to rap, releasing three albums: Kingdom Come, American Gangster, and Blueprint 3, which were, of course, all hits. In 2008, he signed a 150 million dollar contract with Live Nation and created a joint venture called Roc Nation, an entertainment company that handles all aspects of an artist's career.
