In celebrity baby news, it seems Elin Nordegren has a serious thing for professional athletes! What are some ways to determine your “type” of partner?

Cupid’s Advice:

Despite what people may say, everyone has a specific “type” of partner they tend to go for when looking for a relationship. Whether your type is blonde hair and blue eyes, athletes, or only people who went to college, everyone has their own preferences! You just have to experience different types of people, and then you will learn what your type is. Here is Cupid’s advice to figuring out what “type” of partner you’re looking for:

1. Know yourself before you try to know someone else: Before you assume what you think you need in a partner, take a step back and analyze your own personality. Are you talkative? Are you funny? Are you a workaholic? Figure out your own personality traits and find what will match best with who you are.

2. Take your time in finding the right person: The right person for you will come when you least expect it, trust me. Don’t push yourself to try and find your person as soon as possible. When the time is right, you’ll find them.

3. Be patient and understanding: Everything takes time. If you find someone you think you like, take the initiative and ask them out on a date, but don't be discouraged if it takes a bit of time to form a real connection. If it doesn't work out in the end, you take those experiences and learn from them, so you know what to go off of in the future.
