1. Liholiho yacht club

A Hawaiian, Californian and Chinese restaurant managed by an Indian person, the Liholiho Yacht Club has always been a bit left of center. With an alluring minimalist decor and some of the most surprising dishes in town, this is the place to be if you want something upscale. We recommend the duck liver roast, which comes with some flavors that don't seem to go together but, work immensely well. Remember to book reservations way in advanced, since this Hamilton bistro can be reserved for a long time. Remember the cardinal rule of a food crawl even though the food here is delicious, eat a variety of dishes, but, never eat your fill completely.

2. Cala

You can't enjoy San Francisco without having one of their trademark Mexican food plates, and Cala does it better than anyone else. Check out the beautiful decor that comes straight out of the streets of Mexico and then enjoy one of their trademark Tostadas as you dig in. You will experience pure authentic Mexican cuisine here, since, the chef hails from the capital of Mexico herself and has been serving up a storm back at the Mexican capital too. Take up small tasting plates of finger food here and move on.

3. Tartine Manufactory

We're yet to meet a first-time visitor to Tartine Manufactory who hasn't been in complete awe. The restaurant boasts of everything from a fully functional bakery to a wine bar. Check out the freshly baked bread, and partake in some of the savory dishes from the restaurant (the Sea trout roe comes highly recommended) and make your way to the ice cream counter for a personal happy ending to a whole meal for each person of your group. Remember to partake of some of the wine selections too.

4. Spruce

Spruce is what five-star dining is supposed to be. Elegant but not stuffy, and just the right amount of fancy to make it all worth it. Spruce holds a distinction in being true to the Californian cuisine even now, bringing up some of the local dishes in the best way possible. Check out their roasted duck breast and whole meals for a satisfying experience. For this hot spot, book ahead because the seats tend to fill up fast.
