How do you support your partner when you're trying to get pregnant?

Cupids Advice:

You and your partner have been wanting—and trying—to have a baby for a while now, but it just isn't happening yet. During this time, you both are feeling frustrated and overwhelmed. Cupid's here to show you ways to support your spouse:

1. Help them relax: Your husband wants to have a baby so badly that he becomes upset every time the pregnancy test shows up negative. Go to a weekend spa together and take both of your minds off of your struggles to parenthood. A little time away from the situation might be exactly what the 2 of you need.

2. Positive energy: When you are failing to get pregnant and your partner starts losing hope, you are sure to give up as well. Show your partner that you have not given up and are willing to try until your family grows. Once you have a positive attitude, so will your spouse.

3. Make them feel special: Remind your partner how much you love them when they start feeling down about not getting pregnant. Let them know you will always be there, with or without a child. Do something romantic for your wife and show her she will always mean the world to you. This will surely lift her spirits.
