This celebrity news was a long time coming! How do you know whether to go public with the details of your split?

Cupid's Advice:

Some couples breakup and get back together, break up and get back together. For this reason, many are unsure of whether to go public with their splits in fear of being labeled "on-again-off-again." If you've decided that your breakup is a done deal, Cupid is here to help you in revealing details of your split:

1. Time has passed: The best and most level headed way to reveal details of your split is to allow some time to pass. This will help you determine how final your breakup is. After some time has passed, you'll hopefully be less upset and able to speak on why you and your partner split in a calmer manner.

2. Ready to move on: Another aspect you should consider before opening up about your breakup woes, is whether or not you're ready to move on. You may want to share details about your split, but you don't want to sound bitter or hung up on the person you ended things with. Being able to talk about your breakup without malice is also a good sign that you're ready to move on with someone new!

3. Severity of the split: Before going public with your split, you may also need to think of how bad your breakup was. If you find yourself in a situation similar to Lauren Conrad's, you may want to stay a little more private. Be careful in the details you reveal for more sensitive topics. However, if you're breakup was free of this drama you can probably talk about the split with little issue.

How do you decide how long to remain engaged before marriage?

Cupid's Advice:

Let Cupid help you to decide how long of an engagement you should have:

1. Leave time to plan: Every little girl dreams of the perfect wedding, don't disappoint your five year old self by throwing together a ceremony last minute. You'll need at least three months to get everything together, but most brides give themselves about one year.

2. Everyone is different: Depending on what kind of jobs you and your hubby have, there may be a specific time of the year where you'll be able to tie the knot. For example if you're a personal accountant than setting a wedding date in April when your clients' taxes are due is a bad idea.

3. Consider your age: A wedding is very expensive. If you're younger then you may not have enough money saved up right away to have the wedding of your dreams. Don't settle for less, as this will be one of the most memorable days of you life.
